A Lady the Only One Not Mo-

San Luis Obispo, Cak, July 21. The stage running between this place and Templeton was robbed by a masked man last night, while crossing the mountains about ity miles from here. The robber ordered the driver to stop, and immediately covered him with a revolver. He then combiled the passengers, six in number, and the driver, to alight from the stage, and covered the heads of all with masks. The passengers were placed in a row and robbed of about $500 altogether. There was one lady passenger, but nothing taken from her.

The driver was then ordered to throw off Well's & Fargo's express box and the United States mail bags. The box was chopped open, and the contents, which are supposed to have been about $1,000,taken. The mail also was opened and a number of letters examined. The robber then collected his booty and disappeared up the mountain. A sheriff and posse are now in Washington, July 21. Crowded galleries and a good sitendance of members on the floor greeted the chairman this morning as he rose to close the long debate on the tariff bill. Promptly at 11.30 the bill was called up and Mr. Mills after offering two amendments intended to correct typographical errors and having them adopted, proceeded to address the House, beginning by statung the condition of the fluances of the Government, placing the surplus at one hundred and twenty-nine million dollars.

we give good astisfaction—tried to, anyway. We was misfortiheld some years—bought on a venture sometimes and lost, or the Fish would carry away something in a blow. But takin one year with another we couldn't complain, an 'managed to key by somethin' handsome, case of anything should happen. But the tide tunned in '9, an' the the's left me in pretty shoal water. My wife Emily died in '50, an' that was a hard blow, though Kit and me bors put the best we could. But since then, seems as if averything went wrong. I bought hay of the farmers on a spec' one winter, an' it went down a third on my hands. Then a lubberly Brezzam achooner went an' run into us in the Gate, an' cost me more'n I could well spare to repair, lettin' alone losing the freights of four regliar trips in the drivin'st time o' year. Then they went and started that infernal propeller on my route and I was fool enough to try to fight 'em off. But it wasn't no use, as I might 'a known. Sheet m,' sail ain't no wort o' a match for steam and sorew. But I had got reckless like; didn't care; didn't stop to think or count. I fought 'em desperate; carried for half what it coid me to run the schooner; carried for anythin' or for nothin' rather than let the stuff go to the Dreadnought. Week after week the bank book dwindled more and more. Kit tried an' tried to git me to hold on to what we had, an' try some other place. But I was mad an' a fool, an' kep' on losin' regular every trip. [Copyright.]

Hilbury harbor—s little old house by the water ride. Sunset, the last of Juna.

He sat in the open door, looking out. Before him lay the reach of quiet water, winding away to the right, between shaded grassy slopes, patches of rank salt grass and pebbly beach, to the bay and the sound beyond. Across the wooded ridge on the other shore, the golden light of the setting sun came flooding over his gray streaked head and fever worn old fars. There came a weary, wandering look into his eyes, which suit no message to his brain of the pleasant symmer scene Kat saw the strange expression in his face, through the door of the isner room where sho was lung getting tea. That vague, unmeaning look was not strange to her, but only too familiar. Yet it panied her none the less for that. She saw that someghing must be done now, that he must be found and set to work with a purpose, it was almost strong again. It was time to act.

She came through and leaned over his chair, laughed and chatted to him with a loving art smoothed back his grizzled locks with a caresing touch. When he grow brighter she told him her plans for the future, used all a woman's tact and all the skill of love to brighten the doubtful prospect and incite to try once more the battle with fate in which he had been beaten already. She knew there was no use trying to move him by his own interest. He had no beart to try again, no desire for what he might gain. Only one motive was left by which she might more him—his love for her. To that the did appeal, carnestly, prevalingly. She argued her cause with skill and fervor, porsunded, Dreadmonght objour way up, an' Delevan an' his crew chaffed us as they went by and give three cheers for the Dyin' Fish. I couldn't stan' that, no how. I swore I'd take freights free the next day she loaded, m' I did. I borryed what I could from the farmers an' took a full load that day anyway. Delevan laughed on the other side of his mouth that night—ba, ha!

"But that was my last trip I couldn't borry no more money—couldn't pay what I had borryed They come down on me; got a tachment on to the Fish, an' sold me up. She went for a song, poor thing! to Ben Egerley, of Northhaven, and after sheriff, constable and lawyers—no offense, Mr. Wyckel—had got all they could lay their hands on, there was just enough to pay the lean, an' ten dollars an' a quarter to me Well, I don't exactly remember just what happened since I been a little wild, I think, for some time—a little wrong, you know I wouldn't 's cared so if 't hadu't been for the Fish. You've hash hard times, father,' she says, 'but you must keep a good beart. We must bear up an' try again. You'll try, father, won't you,' says Kit, 'for my sake? An' I promised her I would, sir, an' God help me, I will!

"An' that's what I've come about today, or I don't know how 'its but somehow I me, I will!

"An' that's what I've come about today, sir I don't know bow 'tis, but somehow I can't bear to think of goin' on the water under another man, after bein' master so long in the Fish. However there's a bit of land on Kensel Point that a cousin of ours left to Kit some years ago. We'd try an' sell off parl of it to start on the rest with the money, but Kit she promised that she'd never sell it as long as she lived. So I've come to ask you, sir, to lead us five hundred to start with. We'll give you a mortgaga on the place, an' I think we can pay you the interest regular, an' clear it all off in three years. Kit an' me made some calculations 'long of the crops, an' I'm pretty sure we can promise that safe enough. I've brought the deeds of the place so you can see it's all clear."

The lawyer took the papers, examined them carefully, and said.

"This is all straight, I believe, John. I know the farm, I think—the old Haliburton place, but it, on the harbor side of the neck?"

"Yes, that's it," Grale answered. "You'll you fi rry. For me sake, father, for my sake."

He got up and leaned against the door jest. He tooked away across the western hills to the matchless glovy of the sunset charls. The rich, deep glow fell full upon his face and the face was firmer and more manful than it had been for months more like the face of the happy old time that was gone forever. He turned toward Kit them and said, slowly and solemnly, "God help me, Kit, I will."

That night they discussed their plans and prospects, and resolved what had best be done first. Kit saw her father brighter and more hopeful than for many a day, and knew that to keep him so the must be rept in action. So it came about that they made the little necessary preparation for Grale to go to the, tity in the morning. It was rare pleasure to Kit 1, see how he strove against the gloony merta that had grown habitual with him since their troubles, to see him case motor interested and thoughtful of the future. She lay down to rest that night, not indeed without arrively, but with a thankful, happy heart.

"Yes, that's it," Grale answered "You'll be easy on us in the terms, Mr. Wyckel, for the sake of old tames?"
"'I'll make it right," said Wyckel. "You know these things must be done according to rule and custom."
